

WZB

Berlin Social Science Center

Sivan Shlomo-Agon

Noncompliance, Renegotiation, and Justice in International Adjudication: A WTO–EU Perspective

Discussion Paper

SP IV 2015–807

September 2015

Center for Global Constitutionalism

WZB

WZB Berlin Social Science Center

WZB Berlin Social Science Center
Reichpietschufer 50
10785 Berlin
Germany
www.wzb.eu

Copyright remains with the author(s).

Discussion papers of the WZB serve to disseminate the research results of work in progress prior to publication to encourage the exchange of ideas and academic debate. Inclusion of a paper in the discussion paper series does not constitute publication and should not limit publication in any other venue. The discussion papers published by the WZB represent the views of the respective author(s) and not of the institute as a whole.

Wissenschaftszentrum Berlin für Sozialforschung (2015)

Sivan Shlomo-Agon

Noncompliance, Renegotiation, and Justice in International Adjudication: A WTO-EU Perspective

Discussion Paper SP IV 2015–807

Affiliation of the authors other than WZB:

Sivan Shlomo-Agon

Tel Aviv University, Faculty of Law, P.O. Box 39040, Tel Aviv 6997801, Israel

Abstract

The Noncompliance, Renegotiation, and Justice in International Adjudication: A WTO-EU Perspective

by Sivan Shlomo-Agon

Focusing on the expanding realm of international adjudication, this paper approaches justice from the domain of the empirical and shows—through a careful, interview-based case-study analysis in the WTO-EU context—that justice in the transnational context is not only a contested concept, but also a multi-faceted one, deeply embedded in notions such as the rule of law, fairness, equality, transformation, and cooperation. Whereas in the past, the primary, if not the sole role of international courts was that of settling disputes, in their modern legalized reincarnation these empowered international institutions have come to be seen primarily as enforcement mechanisms; mechanisms that have been put in place by states in order to give effect to their originally negotiated commitments and to hold states (or other entities) accountable for the international rules agreed-upon. Within this common enforcement-centered discourse of international courts, in turn, the natural tendency has so far been to think of ‘justice’ mainly through its ‘legal’ or ‘rule of law’ dimension. This paper challenges this enforcement-centered discourse. Focusing on the vibrant WTO dispute settlement system (DSS) and the rich experience of the EU in that system, the paper argues that the current enforcement-oriented debate of international courts, and the WTO DSS in particular, is lacking in several fundamental aspects. First, it brushes aside other important roles served by the DSS, and consequently overshadows the manifold social outcomes—beyond rule-compliance—produced by this system. Second, the prevalent rule-enforcement discourse further works, in turn, as to mask the multiple challenges of justice encapsulated in international disputes reaching the DSS’s docket, and obstructs the need to explore other conceptions of justice—beyond its formal legal-procedural meaning—such as global distributive, corrective, or transformative justice, through which the outcomes generated by this international adjudicatory system may (and should) be evaluated. Against this backdrop, the paper puts forwards a broad multifunctional account of the WTO DSS, which goes beyond the prevalent view of the system as primarily an enforcement mechanism, portraying it instead as a system of multiple, competing, and shifting roles. Among them, and at the center of the paper, the role of providing an orderly mechanism of renegotiation, redistribution, and settlement, that essentially allows WTO Members to readjust their original WTO commitments and reallocate their burdens and benefits of international cooperation, and thereby to arrive at new—at times not fully legally-compliant—but not necessarily ‘unjust’ cooperative and sustainable social outcomes.

This discussion paper is part of a series of contributions to the conference "Towards a Grammar of Justice in EU Law", which took place on 6-7 November 2014 at VU University Amsterdam, sponsored by ACCESS EUROPE Amsterdam, VU Centre for European Legal Studies and the Dutch Research Council VENI grant.

Key words: WTO-EU, international courts, WTO DSS, WTO Members, global judicial system.

I. Introduction

During the last two decades, the world has experienced an intense growth in the number and usage of international courts. These quantitative changes in the global judicial scenery have been intertwined with equally notable qualitative changes in the nature and powers of international adjudicative bodies.<sup>1</sup> Thus, an ever-widening range of issue areas now fall under the jurisdiction of international courts. Furthermore, in many cases this jurisdiction is no longer contingent upon the specific consent of states, but is rather compulsory in nature—meaning that the jurisdiction of many international courts may now be invoked unilaterally against those subject to their authority, in a manner quite similar to that prevailing in domestic legal systems.<sup>2</sup>

Whereas in the past, the primary, if not the sole role of international courts was that of settling disputes,<sup>3</sup> in their modern legalized reincarnation, these empowered international institutions—as the case of the WTO dispute settlement system (DSS) discussed here well illustrates—have come to be seen primarily as enforcement mechanisms;<sup>4</sup> mechanisms that have been put in place by states in order to secure compliance with their originally negotiated commitments, preserve their rights and obligations as allocated in numerous international instruments, and hold states (or other entities) accountable for the

---

<sup>1</sup> Y Shany, 'No Longer a Weak Department of Power? Reflections on the Emergence of a New International Judiciary' (2009) 20 European Journal of International Law 73.

<sup>2</sup> Y Shany, The Competing Jurisdictions of International Courts and Tribunals (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2004); C Romano, 'The Shift from the Consensual to the Compulsory Paradigm in International Adjudication: Elements for a Theory of Consent' (2007) 39 NYU Journal of International Law and Politics 791, 792–96.

<sup>3</sup> A von Bogdandy and Ingo Venzke, 'On the Functions of International Courts: An Appraisal in Light of Their Burgeoning Public Authority' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 49.

<sup>4</sup> See e.g., J Bellinger, 'International Courts and Tribunals and the Rule of Law' in C Romano (ed), The Sword and the Scales: The United States and International Courts and Tribunals (Cambridge University Press, New York, 2009) 1, 2; G Born, 'A New Generation of International Adjudication' (2012) 61 Duke Law Journal 775; B Zangl, 'Is there an Emerging International Rule of Law?' (2005) 13 European Review S73; B Broomhall, International Justice and the International Criminal Court: Between Sovereignty and the Rule of Law (Oxford University Press, New York, 2004) 1–3; A Huneeus, 'Compliance with Judgments and Decisions' in C Romano et al. (eds), The Oxford Handbook of International Adjudication (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2014) 437. The emphasis placed on the enforcement role of international courts is further echoed in the extensive research evaluating their performance against their record in eliciting states compliance with international rules and decisions. See e.g., AT Guzman, 'International Tribunals: A Rational Choice Analysis' (2008) 157 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 171; C Schulte, Compliance with Decisions of the International Court of Justice (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2004); EM Hafner-Burton, G Victor and Y Lupu, 'Political Science Research on International Law: The State of the Field' (2012) 106 American Journal of International Law 47, 93.

international rules agreed-upon, through the interpretation and application of those rules to the cases coming before them.<sup>5</sup>

Within this prevailing enforcement-centered discourse of international courts, in turn, the natural tendency has so far been to think of ‘justice’ mainly through its ‘legal’ or ‘rule of law’ dimension.<sup>6</sup> Thus, justice is often assumed to be delivered by an international adjudicatory system like the WTO DSS, when—following legal procedures that offer equal access to justice<sup>7</sup> and meet proper standards of procedural fairness<sup>8</sup>—the responding WTO Member state discontinues its violative act and brings itself into compliance with WTO rules, so that the original order of rights and duties as enshrined in the WTO agreements is preserved.

In the spirit of this rule of law conception of justice, indeed, a former member of the WTO Appellate Body (AB) noted, ‘there is one goal which is a goal of all law, which is to dispense justice; that if you accept rules, then you have to act according to the rules’, and the WTO DSS ‘helps you to do that’.<sup>9</sup> Under this conception of justice, then, law and judicial mechanisms are perceived as means to deliver justice by controlling noncompliant behavior that reveals itself in a conflict. Notably, this rule of law vision of justice closely corresponds with one of the justice categorizations identified long ago by Aristotle—that

---

<sup>5</sup> For recent contributions that go beyond the prevalent enforcement role or the traditional dispute settlement function of international courts see e.g., von Bogdandy and Venzke (n 3); Y Shany, Assessing the Effectiveness of International Courts: A Goal-Based Approach (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2014).

<sup>6</sup> See e.g., the discussion in E-U Petersmann, ‘International Rule of Law and Constitutional Justice in International Investment Law and Arbitration’ (2009) 16 Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies 513; Broomhall (n 4) 52–62.

<sup>7</sup> The issue of equal access to justice has been extensively discussed in the WTO DSS context, particularly in writing on developing countries participation in the system. See e.g., M Footer, ‘Developing Countries Practice in the Matter of WTO Dispute Settlement’ (2001) 35 Journal of World Trade 55; ML Busch, E Reinhardt, G Shaffer, ‘Does legal capacity matter? A survey of WTO Members’ (2009) 8 World Trade Review 559.

<sup>8</sup> For literature on procedural justice in the international judicial realm see e.g., AK Schneider, ‘Not Quite a World without Trials: Why International Dispute Resolution is Increasingly Judicialized’ (2006) Journal of Dispute Resolution 119; JP Gaffney, ‘Due Process in the World Trade Organization: The Need for Procedural Justice in the Dispute Settlement System’ (1999) 14 American University International Law Review 1173.

<sup>9</sup> Interview with former AB member (19 April 2012).

of ‘legal justice’ or ‘justice as law-abidingness’, under which the legal or the lawful is the just.<sup>10</sup>

The great emphasis placed on the rule-enforcement role of international courts in current scholarship and the legal justice conception attendant thereto, coincides, of course, with the common narrative of the judicialization of international law over the last two decades as signifying a ‘shift from a power-based to a rules-based international system’,<sup>11</sup> and as representing the creation of a ‘new world order based on the rule of international law’;<sup>12</sup> that is, a world order ‘based on compliance with international law’<sup>13</sup> and ‘the application of rule of law principles to relations between States and other subjects of international law’.<sup>14</sup>

In this respect, the legalized WTO DSS established in 1995 is no exception. As noted by Petersmann, ‘[t]he WTO’s quasi-judicial, mandatory dispute settlement procedures are also an ambitious attempt at strengthening the “international rule of law”’.<sup>15</sup> In fact, Petersmann added, ‘[i]n contrast to many UN bodies the WTO has gone far beyond a multilateral arena “for power politics in disguise”’<sup>16</sup> with the adoption of the Dispute Settlement Understanding (DSU)<sup>17</sup>—an instrument that provides for an elaborate

---

<sup>10</sup> D Winthrop, ‘Aristotle and Theories of Justice’ (1978) 72 American Political Science Review 1201, 1203; G Bien, ‘Aristotle on Justice (Book V) in O Höffe (ed), Aristotle’s “Nicomachean Ethics” (Brill, Leiden, 2010) 109–16.

<sup>11</sup> R Teitel and R Howse, ‘Cross-Judging: Tribunalization in a Fragmented but Interconnected Global Order’ (2009) 41 NYU Journal of International Law and Politics 959, 961.

<sup>12</sup> A Cassese, ‘On the Current Trends Towards Criminal Prosecution and Punishment of Breaches of International Humanitarian Law’ (1998) 9 European Journal of International Law 2, 8; Y Shany, ‘Assessing the Effectiveness of International Courts: A Goal-Based Approach’ (2012) 106 American Journal of International Law 225, 226; Bellinger (n 4) 2; B Kingsbury, ‘Foreword: Is the Proliferation of International Courts and Tribunals a Systemic Problem?’ (1999) 31 NYU Journal of International Law and Politics 679, 688.

<sup>13</sup> Broomhall (n 4) 53.

<sup>14</sup> S Chesterman, ‘An International Rule of Law?’ (2008) 56 American Journal of Comparative Law 331, 355–6.

<sup>15</sup> E-U Petersmann, ‘How to Promote the International Rule of Law? Contributions by the World Trade Organization Appellate Review System’ (1998) 1 Journal of International Economic Law 25, 31.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid.

<sup>17</sup> Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes, 15 April 1994, Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization, Annex 2, 1869 U.N.T.S. 401.

enforcement mechanism 'by which WTO Members can seek the full implementation of previously negotiated trade concessions'.<sup>18</sup>

While enforcement is surely a pivotal role of the legalized and empowered international judiciary, the current enforcement-centered debate of international courts, and the WTO DSS in particular, this article submits, is lacking in several fundamental aspects. First, it brushes aside other important roles expected to be performed and actually played by the WTO DSS, and consequently overshadows the diverse social outcomes—beyond rule-compliance—generated by this adjudicatory system.

Second, the prevalent rule-enforcement discourse further works, in turn, as to mask the multiple and complex challenges of justice encapsulated in international disputes reaching the DSS's docket, and obstructs the need to explore other conceptions of justice—beyond its formal legal-procedural meaning—through which the diverse roles and social outcomes of the DSS may (and should) be evaluated. Such conceptions, as illustrated in the article, may include global distributive, corrective or transformative justice, which look not only to rules and procedures, but also ask what would be a just allocation of the international rights and duties in a given case, what might recompense for past wrongs, or what would assist the parties in conflict to move toward an amicable settlement that accommodates their competing interests and fashions long-term cooperative international relations.

Finally, and related to the previous point, the dominant enforcement-centered discourse—by conceptualizing justice mainly through legal and procedural terms—further falls short of addressing the interplay between the various dimensions of justice that essentially come into play in WTO adjudication, and the tensions latent among them. Particularly, as exemplified herein, the tension associated with the rule of law dimension of justice, which in its preference for order, stability and equal enforcement of the law, may hinder change and the promotion justice, construed as reallocation of pertinent international benefits and burdens, or as redress of injuries suffered in the context of past or present bilateral relationships.

---

<sup>18</sup> D Evans and GC Shaffer, 'Introduction', in GC Shaffer and R Meléndez-Ortiz (eds), Dispute Settlement at the WTO: The Developing Countries Experience (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 2010) 1, 1–2. The DSS's view as primarily an enforcement mechanism whose key goal is inducing compliance with WTO rules is prevalent in current literature. See P Eeckhout, 'Remedies and Compliance' in D. Bethlehem et al. (eds), The Oxford Handbook of International Trade Law, (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2009) 437, 443; J Nzelibe, 'The Case Against Reforming the WTO Enforcement Mechanism' (2008) University of Illinois Law Review 319; CP Bown, 'The Economics of Trade Disputes, The GATT's Article XXII, and the WTO's Dispute Settlement Understanding' (2002) 14 Economics and Politics 283, 284, 288–9 (addressing the emphasis placed in the literature on the DSS's enforcement role, to the neglect of its role as a forum of conciliation and negotiation).

Against this backdrop, the present article first seeks to unfold a more complex functional account of the mandatory WTO DSS, which goes beyond the prevalent view of the system as primarily an instrument of legal enforcement, designed to dispense justice in a narrow legalistic sense of upholding the rule of law and preserving previously agreed-upon international commitments and entitlements. Instead, the article views the compulsory WTO DSS—a judicial system nested within a major edifice of global economic governance—as a system of multiple, conflicting and shifting institutional roles.<sup>19</sup> Among them, and at the center of this contribution, the role of providing an orderly mechanism of renegotiation, redistribution, and settlement, that essentially allows WTO Members to readjust their original WTO commitments and reallocate their burdens and benefits of international cooperation, and thereby to arrive at new—at times not fully legally compliant—but not necessarily ‘unjust’ cooperative and sustainable social outcomes. In putting forward this broader functional account of the WTO DSS, the present contribution thus strives not least to call attention to several descriptive and normative questions concerning the roles played by this global governance institution, the social goods it generates, as well as its influence on pertinent issues of justice in the global arena—questions that call for further, more critical academic treatment and investigation.

The article is a modest inductive exploration of these questions, carried out through a qualitative empirical analysis of the perennial conflict over trade in bananas launched against the European Union (EU) in the 1990s.<sup>20</sup> Rooted in ex-colonial ties, transatlantic rivalry, and splits among competing groups of developing countries, the famous EC-Bananas dispute entangled the EU in enduring noncompliance with WTO law and came to an end only in 2012, after several rounds of WTO litigation and negotiation, with a mutually agreed (not yet fully WTO-compliant) settlement. Being the dispute that most aply illustrates the intertwining between adjudication and negotiation in the WTO,<sup>21</sup> and given the long-lasting noncompliance featuring this case, EC-Bananas provides an informative venue for probing the manifold institutional roles played and outcomes produced by the WTO DSS; particularly, the DSS's role in generating settlement-renegotiations and in shifting the allocation of rights and duties between WTO Members (rather than merely being a means for enforcing the originally agreed-upon distribution of entitlements enshrined in the WTO treaty). In light of such roles and outcomes, and against the various political, economic and moral intricacies underlying the dispute, EC-Bananas further offers an instructive site for exploring the complex challenges of justice invoked in WTO adjudication, and for illuminating the need to develop a broader grammar of justice for assessing the institutional roles played and social effects actually generated by the legalized WTO DSS.

---

<sup>19</sup> For an inclusive account of the DSS’s roles and goals see S Shlomo-Agon, Is it All about Compliance: Towards a Multidimensional Goal-Based Approach for Analyzing the Effectiveness of the WTO DSS (unpublished PhD dissertation, December 2013) 97–147.

<sup>20</sup> Appellate Body Report, European Communities–Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, WT/DS27/AB/R (9 September 1997).

Following this introduction, the article thus proceeds in Section II with a brief recollection of the renowned Bananas dispute, laying down its basic facts, while delineating the politico-economic intricacies and multi-faceted challenges of justice underling the dispute, as unfolded through the lens of WTO practitioners involved in the case. Against this backdrop, Section III turns to present the common reading of the Bananas dispute as it is often portrayed through the prevalent enforcement-centered perspective of the WTO DSS. This common reading is thereafter contrasted with an alternative, multifunctional reading of EC-Bananas, informed as well by empirical evidence generated through in-depth semi-structured interviews with professionals with firsthand knowledge of the case.<sup>22</sup> As Section III well illustrates, through the interviews it has been possible not only to illuminate the complexities underlying the perennial Bananas dispute, but also to put forward a revealing insider's view of the manner in which such intricacies constructed the enhanced role the DSS came to play along this conflict as a forum of renegotiation, redistribution and settlement, and shaped the mixed noncompliant outcomes ultimately <sup>22</sup> These interviews form part of a series of more than forty semi-structured interviews conducted by the author, mainly in Geneva, along 2012. This paper draws on fifteen of these interviews. The interviews—each of which lasted an average of one hour—were conducted with well-placed WTO professionals, among them: AB members, panellists, senior and mid-level staff members of the WTO Secretariat, WTO ambassadors, legal counsel in trade delegations, and lawyers in private law firms and the Advisory Center on WTO Law (ACWL). For reasons of anonymity, the interviewees are cited throughout this work with generic references, such as 'EU official' or 'WTO legal officer'.

---

<sup>21</sup> H Ruiz-Fabri, 'The Relationship between Negotiations and Third-Party Dispute Settlement at the WTO, with an Emphasis on the EC-Bananas Dispute' in L boisson de Chazournes et al. (eds), Diplomatic and Judicial Means of Dispute Settlement (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Boston, 2013) 87, 89.

brought about in the case. Finally, in light of the broader account of the DSS's roles and outcomes unfolded through the alternative reading of EC-Bananas in Section III, Section IV then moves to address various dimensions of justice that have so far been marginalized in the prevalent enforcement-oriented debate of the case. On this basis, this section further stresses the need to widen the lens of justice—beyond the rule of law—in writing on the WTO DSS so as to more critically assess the actual functions served and social impacts produced by this global judicial system.<sup>23</sup> Section V concludes.

II. EC-Bananas: The Basic Pieces of the Complex Puzzle

EC-Bananas was one of the very first disputes to arrive in 1995 to the newly established mandatory WTO DSS. The origins of the dispute—which followed two previous legal challenges before the GATT DSS—trace back to the creation of the common EU regime for trade in bananas in 1993, as part of the implementation of the Single European Act. The unified EU regime, replacing the patchwork of banana import policies previously employed by EU Members, was established after four years of hard-fought negotiations. In devising this regime, some EU Members—particularly France and the United Kingdom—sought to maintain the preferential trade arrangements that had long been accorded under the Lomé Conventions to ACP countries (i.e. ex-European colonies in Africa, the Caribbean, and the Pacific). The fear was that absent these preferential trade arrangements, small-scale banana growers in the ACPs would be completely eliminated from the EU market by highly competitive Latin American banana producers, leading to the destruction of the ACPs economies and possibly their political systems.<sup>24</sup>

As a result, in an attempt to preserve the special position of ACP bananas vis-à-vis the EU market, the single EU banana regime introduced in 1993—against the will of some other

---

<sup>23</sup> Forming part of the special issue 'Towards a Grammar of Justice and Justification in EU and Transnational Context', the present article then approaches justice from the domain of the empirical and shows—through an interview-based case-study analysis in the WTO-EU context—that justice in the transnational context is not only a contested concept, but also a multi-faceted one, deeply embedded in notions such as the rule of law, fairness, equality, transformation, and cooperation.

<sup>24</sup> HR Clark, 'The WTO Banana Dispute Settlement and its Implications for Trade Relations between the United States and the European Union' (2002) 35 Cornell International Law Journal 291, 301; K Buterbaugh and R Fulton, The WTO Primer: Tracing Trade's Visible Hand Through Case Studies (Palgrave Macmillan, New York, 2007) 93–94, 102.

EU Members such as Germany, the Netherlands, and Belgium—put in place a complex interventionist system of tariff, quota and license requirements. The said system benefited the ACP countries and firms that traditionally traded in EU and ACP bananas, while imposing heavy costs on countries in Latin America, where banana production was largely dominated by US-based multinational companies. Substantial costs were also inflicted by the EU banana regime on consumers in some EU Member states with loose colonial ties (e.g., Germany), which under the new regime were required to replace their previous liberal market of low cost Latin American bananas with more expensive EU and ACP bananas.

The single EU banana regime fell afoul of basic WTO rules. Particularly, the preferences accorded by the EU to one group of banana exporters (ACP producers) but not to other exporters (Latin American producers), constituted a violation of the basic most-favored nation (MFN) obligation, which requires WTO Members to treat all their trading partners equally. Once in place, the banana policy was thus immediately challenged in the multilateral trade system, giving rise to a lengthy dispute in which the US teamed with the Latin American countries, while the EU lined up with the ACPs (some of which assumed the role of third-parties in the WTO dispute). EC-Bananas thus involved not only a transatlantic rivalry and loaded north-south relations; it was also a south-south quarrel in which ‘developing countries with conflicting interests’ were found ‘beating themselves on different sides of the table’.<sup>25</sup>

The complex Bananas dispute rambled on in the WTO DSS for almost two decades, testing almost every corner of the system until the formal resolution of the dispute in 2012. Throughout the years several litigation rounds, including special arbitrations and several DSU Article 21.5 compliance proceedings were held under the DSS’s auspices. In all of these proceedings WTO adjudicators sided, in one form or another, with the US and the Latin Americans, declaring the EU banana policy to be WTO-inconsistent. Such legal rulings were further accompanied by the authorization of two of the complainants, Ecuador and the US, to retaliate (i.e. to suspend trade concessions) against the EU—a right ultimately exercised by the US alone.

---

<sup>25</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (10 July 2012).

While this series of adverse legal rulings and authorized sanctions generated some incremental changes to the EU banana regime along the years, it should be noted, discrimination against Latin American banana exports—and therefore noncompliance on the part of the EU with WTO rulings and rules—persisted all along.<sup>26</sup>

Explaining the enduring EU noncompliance in the perennial Bananas dispute and the ‘impossibility to solve’ the case for nearly two decades,<sup>27</sup> a former EU official involved in the case stated:

[The problem in this case was rooted in the] conflicting trade commitments... The EU’s problem was the commitment to the ACP countries, which is founded on historical relations, which is of a very special nature, and which is not such that you can just dump it, basically... It was not that the European market itself was being protectionist... It was really about the ACP countries. So it was basically the EU defending the interest of the ACP countries against other developing countries for equally legitimate concerns. And how do you want to solve that? I mean, the WTO in a sense decided each time but it was just impossible to implement it like that.<sup>28</sup>

A lawyer representing one of the Latin American complainants in EC-Bananas similarly emphasized, that ‘it wasn’t just about changing EU protectionism’ in this case. ‘The real clients of protectionism were... the banana exporters from all the former colonies who had these preferential arrangements. And so, that made it... extremely complicated because, of course, the EU was arguing that... it couldn’t just abandon... all these programs for the benefit of these poor countries’.<sup>29</sup>

For the EU, then, the will to complete the single European market, while at the same time keep assuming responsibility for former European colonies in the ACPs<sup>30</sup> and maintaining the Lomé Conventions commitments towards this group of developing countries, proved

---

<sup>26</sup> E Guth, ‘The End of the Bananas Saga’ (2012) 46 Journal of World Trade 1, 6–7.

<sup>27</sup> For an elaborate discussion of the various complicating factors that rendered EC-Bananas a ‘perennial’ dispute see Shlomo-Agon (n 19), 263–271.

<sup>28</sup> Interview with former EU official (9 July 2012); Interview with Ecuadorian official (17 July 2012).

<sup>29</sup> Interview with WTO practitioner (11 July 2012).

<sup>30</sup> H Hauser and A Roitinger, ‘Renegotiation in Transatlantic Trade Disputes’ in E-U Petersmann and MA Pollack (eds), Transatlantic Economic Disputes: The EU, the US, and the WTO (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2003) [hereinafter Transatlantic Economic Disputes] 487, 503.

highly difficult to reconcile with its WTO obligations.<sup>31</sup> This difficulty was further aggravated by the pressures exerted by the ACPs to retain their post-colonial trade preferences once legal action was taken against the EU banana regime in the multilateral trade framework.<sup>32</sup> EU recalcitrance, therefore, as noted by Colares, resulted not so much from the EU's outright indifference to compliance with its international commitments, but mainly because it valued certain commitments more than others.<sup>33</sup>

That said, while the EU invoked its historical ties and long-standing commitment to the development of the ACPs as the main justification for its prolonged noncompliance in EC-Bananas, amidst the Latin American complainants the preferential treatment accorded to the ACPs as a means to remedy for past colonial wrongs,<sup>34</sup> gave rise not only to valid legal claims of trade discrimination, but also to vocal claims of 'unfairness', as the following quote of a former Latin American official makes clear:

[O]ur understanding is that... [the EU] wanted to protect the ACPs market... because they have historic relation with ACP countries, some of them are ex-colonies and they have this political commitment for the development of these Members, which we found unfair to the Latin American countries because we were also ex-colonies of... some of the Members of the European Union.... [T]his is something that [is] difficult... to understand but you will find that the preference of the EU will be always... ACPs... instead of Latin American countries.<sup>35</sup>

Note, however, that while the EU preference was accorded to the ACPs, leading to the dependence of some of those economies on the continued sale of bananas at preferential prices in the EU market,<sup>36</sup> trade in bananas also involved the 'livelihood of... many...

---

<sup>31</sup> KJ Alter and S Meunier, 'Nested and Overlapping Regimes in the Transatlantic Banana Trade Dispute' (2006) 13 Journal of European Public Policy 362.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid, 374; Buterbaugh and Fulton (n 24) 102.

<sup>33</sup> JF Colares, 'The Limits of WTO Adjudication: Is Compliance the Problem' (2011) 14 Journal of International Economic Law 403, 428.

<sup>34</sup> Interview with WTO practitioner (19 April 2012) (noting that 'the main reason why the European authorities decided to maintain' the discriminatory banana import system was their belief that in this way they were 'paying back' to the former colonies the things that they 'took away from them' as colonizers); Interview with WTO official (5 July 2012).

<sup>35</sup> Interview with former official of Guatemala (24 July 2012) (alternations added).

<sup>36</sup> Buterbaugh and Fulton (n 24) 93–94; Tim Josling and Tim Taylor, 'Introduction', in TE Josling and TG Taylor (eds), Banana Wars: The Anatomy of a Trade Dispute (CABI Publishing, Cambridge MA, 2003) [hereinafter Banana Wars] 1, 2.

constituents' in the Latin American countries,<sup>37</sup> for some of which this was 'their only or major export... opportunity'.<sup>38</sup>

And so, despite the apparent legal simplicity of EC-Bananas, involving mainly straightforward arguments of trade discrimination, behind the legal veil and claims of WTO violations, as the above suggests, were lying profound tensions of supranational EU politics, post-colonialism, north-south frictions, and splits among developing countries, all heavily dependent on bananas for their economic welfare. Beneath the surface of EC-Bananas, therefore, were essentially bubbling multiple questions of justice at the global level, which included but went far beyond those pertaining to the WTO legal breaches involved.

At the end of the day, after several rounds of WTO litigation, embedded in enduring diplomatic attempts to resolve the case in the shadow of the law, the prolonged Bananas dispute finally came to an end with a negotiated settlement in late 2012. Under the said settlement—which takes the form of two complementing 'Geneva Agreements on Trade in Bananas' (concluded between the EU and the Latin American countries, and the EU and the US)—the complainants, on their part, agreed to terminate the WTO dispute. The EU, in return, committed to maintain a tariff-only regime for the importation of bananas, and to substantially lower its MFN banana tariffs in the WTO schedules over a fixed period of time.<sup>39</sup> Yet, while under the Geneva Agreement the complainants were granted improved market access rights to the EU, upon the entry into force of the agreement, and in fact until this very day, bananas originating in ACP countries keep on entering the European market on preferential terms. The preferential tariffs still accorded to the ACPs, however, are currently not covered by any relevant WTO waiver or exception, such as the free trade agreements (FTAs) exception enshrined in GATT Article XXIV.<sup>40</sup>

---

<sup>37</sup> Interview with ACWL lawyer (27 July 2012).

<sup>38</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (10 July 2012).

<sup>39</sup> The EU-Latin American countries agreement entered into force on 1 May 2012, available at <http://ec.europa.eu/world/agreements/prepareCreateTreatiesWorkspace/treatiesGeneralData.do?step=0&redirect=true&treatyId=8501&back=8502>, accessed 25 June 2015. The EU-US agreement entered into force on 24 January 2013, available at <http://ec.europa.eu/world/agreements/prepareCreateTreatiesWorkspace/treatiesGeneralData.do?step=0&redirect=true&treatyId=8502&back=8501>, accessed 25 June 2015.

<sup>40</sup> Note that in order to bring the ACPs' preferential trade arrangements under the auspices of the FTAs exception of GATT Article XXIV, the EU indeed launched in 2003 the Economic Partnership Agreements

Thus, while a satisfactory negotiated settlement was achieved to one of the most acrimonious international trade disputes, reallocating the rights and duties of international economic cooperation between the numerous parties and third-parties with interest at stake,<sup>41</sup> the state of noncompliance with WTO obligations as originally anchored in the WTO treaty was not fully alleviated by the Bananas settlement, and it essentially continues to persist long after the settlement has been concluded.

III. Beyond Enforcement: An Empirical Account of EC-Bananas and the Multiple Roles and Outcomes of WTO Adjudication

While equipped with compulsory jurisdiction, an elaborate implementation mechanism, including the power to authorize trade sanctions against recalcitrant Members in cases of continued noncompliance, in the perennial Bananas dispute the WTO DSS fell short of delivering a fully legally-compliant outcome. In other words, it failed to preserve the rights and obligations of WTO Members as originally distributed in the WTO agreements—a function explicitly prescribed for the DSS in DSU Article 3.2<sup>42</sup>; this is due to the maintenance of the EU's tariff preferences for the ACPs in the absence of a WTO waiver or WTO-compatible FTAs that may absolve the continuing infringement of the fundamental MFN rule.

From a static and narrow perspective that captures the WTO DSS through its 'primary' rule-enforcement function, the noncompliant outcome ultimately produced in EC-Bananas

---

(EPAs) negotiations with groups of ACPs. Yet, due to the ACPs' reluctance to substitute their unilateral trade preferences from the EU with reciprocal trade commitments under the EPAs, as required by GATT Article XXIV, at the time of writing, most of the EPAs have not yet been completed. See European Commission, 'Overview of EPAs Negotiations' (2015) <http://trade.ec.europa.eu/doclib/docs/2009/september/tradoc\_144912.pdf>, accessed 25 June 2015. As noted by Guth, however, in order to terminate the remaining gap of EU-noncompliance in EC-Bananas and bring banana imports from the ACPs into full conformity with the WTO rules, it is necessary that all EPAs will be signed and implemented. Guth (n 26) 8.

<sup>41</sup> Interviews with WTO practitioners indeed reveal general satisfaction among governments and the private sector with the mutually-agreed solution achieved in EC-Bananas. See Interview with Ecuadorian official (17 July 2012); Interview with former WTO ambassador (23 July 2012); Interview with EU official (9 July 2012); Interview with senior WTO official (23 March 2012); Interview with WTO practitioner (19 April 2012).

<sup>42</sup> DSU art 3.2 states that the WTO DSS 'serves to preserve the rights and obligations of Members under the covered agreements'.

may be portrayed, of course, as the final—disappointing yet unsurprising—chapter of a chronicle of enduring noncompliance, and thereby as a blatant instance of injustice, in which the EU effectively negotiated and bought its way out of compliance with WTO rules. Nourished by the dominant view of the WTO DSS as an enforcement mechanism and the prevalent conception of justice attendant thereto—under which in cases of violation justice operates to maintain the distribution of expectations articulated in the WTO agreement through the withdrawal of the noncompliant measure<sup>43</sup>—this is, indeed, the common reading of the Bananas case; a case that along the years has been repeatedly depicted by commentators as the poster-boy of noncompliance, and as an abject failure of the DSS to hold the EU accountable for the WTO obligations it originally committed to.<sup>44</sup>

Within this prevalent legalistic and enforcement-oriented discourse of EC-Bananas, another pivotal concern of justice often flagged by commentators when addressing this case has been the problem of unequal access to justice featuring the current WTO DSS. In this respect, the hurdles faced by Ecuador in implementing its retaliatory rights against the EU in EC-Bananas have been aptly invoked as to illustrate the inability of many developing countries (given their small markets and dependence on exports) to have effective recourse to the DSS's remedies mechanism; a mechanism that relies almost exclusively on the suspension of trade concessions vis-à-vis the respondent as a means to elicit compliance.<sup>45</sup> In terms of procedural justice, it has been argued in this regard, the incapacity of small developing countries like Ecuador to put sufficient pressure on larger, more developed WTO Members, runs the risk of them being marginalized in the WTO

---

<sup>43</sup> C Carmody, 'A Theory of WTO Law' (2008) 11 Journal on International Economic Law 527, 532.

<sup>44</sup> See e.g., BL Brimeyer, 'Banana, Beef, and Compliance in the World Trade Organization: The Inability of the WTO Dispute Settlement Process to Achieve Compliance from Superpower Nations' (2001) 10 Minnesota Journal of Global Trade 133; KJ Alter, 'Resolving or Exacerbating Disputes? The WTO's New Dispute Resolution System' (2003) 79 International Affairs 783; WJ Davey, 'Compliance Problems in WTO Dispute Settlement' (2009) 42 Cornell International Law Journal 119, 120; ML Busch and E Reinhardt, 'Transatlantic Trade Conflicts and GATT/WTO Dispute Settlement' in Transatlantic Economic Disputes (n 30) 465, 475–9; Petros C. Mavroidis, 'The Trade Disputes Concerning Health Policy Between the EC and the US' in Transatlantic Economic Disputes (n 30) 233, 244–5.

<sup>45</sup> J Smith, 'Inequality in International Trade? Developing Countries and Institutional Change in WTO Dispute Settlement' (2004) 11 Review of International Political Economy 542, 548.

judicial process,<sup>46</sup> and makes their access to the existing WTO enforcement mechanism unequal to that of developed states.<sup>47</sup>

While this common reading of EC-Bananas, unfolded through the prevalent enforcement-oriented perspective of the WTO DSS, highlights important aspects of the roles played and outcomes produced by the system, and brings to the fore pertinent issues of justice associated therewith, this reading, it is submitted, is only partial. As shown below, an in-depth empirical legal analysis of EC-Bananas discloses, indeed, a more complex story of the multiple roles served and outcomes generated by the DSS, and consequently brings to light (in Section IV) other critical aspects of justice pertaining to the Bananas conflict and the DSS's operation more generally.

This analysis of EC-Bananas recounts a story of an international judicial system that in certain disputes—and in contrast to the conventional wisdom—is not geared primarily toward the mechanical enforcement of WTO rules, but rather plays an enhanced role in the interstice between law and politics. In this framework, as the following discussion demonstrates, the prominent role played by the DSS along the Bananas dispute seems to have revolved around two main paths.<sup>48</sup> First, throughout the protracted conflict and until its final resolution, the DSS played a systemic role in containing the charged and recidivist dispute within defined legal parameters and in providing an outlet for the claimed interstate injustices, thereby allowing the parties to keep cooperating on other fronts and deflecting destabilizing effects on the WTO regime. Second, through its successive rulings, legal clarifications, and findings of EU violation promulgated along the various litigation rounds of EC-Bananas, the DSS further served a pivotal function in stimulating renegotiations and in constructing focal points around which the parties could coordinate toward a settlement;<sup>49</sup> i.e. an agreement that readjusts the original terms of the bargain as

---

<sup>46</sup> Footer (n 7) 94.

<sup>47</sup> M Bronckers and N van den Broek, 'Financial Compensation in the WTO: Improving the Remedies of WTO Dispute Settlement' (2005) 8 Journal of International Economic Law 101, 106.

<sup>48</sup> For an elaborate discussion of this role see Shlomo-Agon (n 19) 271–291.

<sup>49</sup> For relevant writing on the function of the WTO DSS and other international courts as a means to facilitate dispute settlement through information-dissemination, construction of focal points, and stimulation of renegotiations see Guzman (n 4) 180–183; Michael Gilligan, L Johns, and P Rosendorff, 'Strengthening International Courts and the Early Settlement of Disputes' (2010) 54 Journal of Conflict Resolution 5, 10–11; T Ginsburg and RH McAdams, 'Adjudicating in Anarchy: An Expressive Theory of International Dispute Resolution' (2004) 45 William & Mary Law Review 1229; J Linarelli, 'The Role of Dispute Settlement in World Trade Law: Some Lessons from the Kodak-Fuji Dispute' (2000) 31 Law and stipulated in the WTO treaty, accommodates the interests of the various parties involved, and reallocates the rights and burdens of international economic cooperation among them.

The claimed shift towards these institutional roles of the DSS in EC-Bananas, as shown below, emerges from numerous interviews with professionals involved in the case, as well as from indications embedded in the WTO jurisprudence itself.

Evidence from the Field

The shift in emphasis from the DSS's enforcement function to its roles of dispute-containment, settlement facilitation, and renegotiation in EC-Bananas, as just noted, is gleaned, first and foremost, from the testimonies of insiders with firsthand knowledge of the dispute. Thus, a former EU official involved in EC-Bananas observed, in such complex and intense cases, the WTO DSS does not serve the 'classical straightforward' role of 'finding the truth, declaring the truth and then having everybody complying with the truth'; instead, it serves 'as a leverage', 'as a tool to find the solution elsewhere', outside the formal judicial process.<sup>50</sup>

Elaborating further, a staff member of the AB secretariat involved in EC-Bananas noted that in this sort of convoluted cases the DSS plays two main roles. On the one hand, 'it provides a non-negotiated solution to the dispute'—that is, it provides legal answers to the disputed issues raised in the case. On the other hand, the DSS continues to play a role in the post-litigation bargaining between the parties, as the latter renegotiate on the basis of the findings and clarifications provided in the DSS rulings. Those were the roles played by the DSS in the Bananas dispute, this official stressed, and those are the roles being played in other perennial WTO disputes, such as the ongoing transatlantic Aircraft conflicts.<sup>51</sup>

---

Policy in International Business 263, 335. For similar ideas regarding courts more generally see J Scott and SP Sturm, 'Courts as Catalysts: Rethinking the Judicial Role in New Governance' (2007) 13 Columbia Journal of European Law 565.

<sup>50</sup> Interview with former EU official (9 July 2012).

<sup>51</sup> Interview with member of the AB Secretariat (4 July 2012).

Finally, and along similar lines, another WTO official involved in EC-Bananas stated as follows when explaining the function served by the DSS throughout this charged conflict:

[B]y making successive findings of inconsistencies ... [the DSS] helped [the] parties to negotiate an agreement.... [T]his [dispute] was so political that it had to be done through a negotiation. But [following]... each of the [WTO] cases... the successive negotiations brought [the] parties closer to a better solution, one which guaranteed [the Latin American countries] better conditions of access to the European market, less discrimination, and more development assistance for the [ACP] countries which were affected....<sup>52</sup>

A close look at the sequence of events in EC-Bananas elucidates how the abovementioned DSS's roles of facilitating the settlement of the dispute and the accommodation of the competing interests through renegotiations actually operated on the ground. As for the EU, the series of DSS rulings rendered in favor of the US and the Latin American complainants along the Bananas dispute, accompanied by the implementation of trade sanctions by the US, attributed both reputational and economic costs to the violation of WTO law and the continued state of EU noncompliance; such costs effectively turned the alternatives previously available to the EU of simply refusing to act or to engage in negotiation with the complainants much more expensive, thereby triggering a strong demand on its part for renegotiation.<sup>53</sup> Thus, a former EU official involved in the case explained, 'it was quite a pressure on the EU to be continuously losing these cases without being able to comply'. In addition, this official noted, these cases gave the complainants:

the leverage of saying [to the EU], 'You're not compliant with the dispute settlement system, you have to do something', and that worked. The EU really felt they have to do

---

<sup>52</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (16 March 2012) (alternations added).

<sup>53</sup> Hauser and Roitinger, (n 30) 504. Note at this point, that precisely in order to assure the EU's ability to negotiate a solution—other than withdrawing a measure found by the DSS to violate WTO law—the ECJ has consistently denied 'direct effect' to WTO rulings and rules, including in the context of EC-Bananas. That is, the ECJ has denied the possibility of individuals and EU Members to challenge the validity of EU measures through an appeal to WTO law or legal rulings. See Case C-149/96, Portuguese Republic v. Council 1999 E.C.R. I-8395, paras 38-46; M Bronckers, 'From "Direct Effect" to "Muted Dialogue": Recent Developments in the European Courts' Case Law on WTO and Beyond' (2008) 11 Journal of International Economic Law 885; S Griller, 'Judicial Enforceability of WTO Law in the European Union: Annotation to Case C-149/96, Portugal V. Council' (2000) Journal of International Economic Law 441.

something in order to get this off the table.... And so, this was really the incentive then to say, 'Okay, let's find a solution for this'. Otherwise it wouldn't have happened.<sup>54</sup>

A similar picture was depicted by a US official, who noted that 'the EU... never would have done anything to provide additional [market] access on bananas... if it wasn't for the dispute settlement system.... [T]hat was the entire mechanism that prompted the change, even though the change wasn't... done' in such a way that the respondent withdrew its WTO-inconsistent measure, 'which is the standard way for most disputes'. 'But still', this official further commented, 'without the disputes... there would've been no way that they would have... accommodated the concerns of any of the other parties'.<sup>55</sup>

As for the complainants, although the banana controversy had already been decided in their favor, both the US and the Latin American countries accepted the demand expressed by the EU for renegotiation.<sup>56</sup> In fact, the complainants 'did not alter their readiness to negotiate even after it had become obvious that the EC would not comply', while they were using the series of favorable DSS rulings as a leverage in the negotiations and as a means to push the negotiations forward.<sup>57</sup> In this spirit, indeed, a former Latin American ambassador noted, '[t]he dispute settlement [process] was exactly to allow our side... the winners... to push the negotiations' with the EU towards a mutually-agreed solution.<sup>58</sup>

From a rule-enforcement perspective of the WTO DSS, as two commentators have rightly observed, it is hard to explain this 'readiness of the complainants at various stages [of the Bananas dispute] to renegotiate an issue which had already been decided in their favour'.<sup>59</sup>

Arguably, a broad perspective of the DSS as a multifunction mechanism for renegotiation,

---

<sup>54</sup> Interview with former EU official (9 July 2012) (alternations added). A lawyer representing the ACPs in EC-Bananas similarly stressed the 'very tangible pressure' exercised by the DSS on the EU in this case, the EU's inability to refuse taking actions concerning its banana regime in the face of the adverse DSS rulings, and the major DSS's contribution to 'bending' the EU's 'negotiating positions' in the negotiations over the new EU tariffs for banana imports as part of the settlement of the dispute. Interview with private attorney (19 July 2012).

<sup>55</sup> Interview with US official (17 July 2012) (alternation added).

<sup>56</sup> Hauser and Roitinger (n 30) 504.

<sup>57</sup> Ibid.

<sup>58</sup> Interview with former WTO ambassador (23 July 2012) (alternation added); Interview with former official of Guatemala (24 July 2012) (noting that 'even though there was no compliance in terms of the Dispute Settlement Mechanism' in EC-Bananas, the DSS 'was an important element conducive to the negotiations that ended in the Geneva Agreement').

<sup>59</sup> Hauser and Roitinger (n 30) 504 (alternation added).

for shaping bargaining positions, and for arriving at newly agreed modes of allocation between the disputing parties, may better explain such readiness.

Note at this point, that the importance of these particular functions of the DSS may not be overstated especially in situations like the Bananas case, where striking power asymmetry exists between the respondent (the EU) and most of the complainants (the Latin American countries). Thus, for example, an Ecuadorian official commented that 'if we would not have this [dispute settlement] system... in a purely bilateral relationship between the EU and Ecuador.... I don't think we would have settled this case because of the huge asymmetry between the EU and Ecuador'.<sup>60</sup> Elucidating further the vitality of the proceedings pursued before the mandatory DSS as a means for setting the stage for negotiations between the EU and the Latin American countries, a former official of Guatemala involved in the case stressed, the Bananas dispute had to be brought before the DSS:

[Because] otherwise we wouldn't have the Bananas Agreement today. Why would the EU negotiate with the Latin American countries in the first place if we don't have this leverage of saying, 'Okay, you are in noncompliance.' I don't see a particular reason, especially if they are protecting the interest of the ACP countries.<sup>61</sup>

Against this backdrop, a WTO legal officer involved in EC-Bananas interestingly concluded with the following statement when addressing this case:

[EC]-Bananas... showed that the WTO dispute settlement is a tool to achieve something, a tool to achieve something that might not necessarily be full legal compliance.... Bananas had shown that the Latin Americans and all of the constituents involved in this dispute wanted to achieve something. The EU wanted to maintain some privileges for [the] ACPs, it was politically taboo not to maintain something. The Latin Americans wanted to improve their standing of their exports, the US too, and they tried various ways.... also political [avenues] outside of the WTO dispute settlement [system]. And the WTO dispute settlement

---

<sup>60</sup> Interview with Ecuadorian official (17 July 2012).

<sup>61</sup> Interview with former official of Guatemala (24 July 2012) (alternation added); Interview with former WTO ambassador (23 July 2012).

[system] was an effective and a very sort of powerful tool, but only part of an arsenal, of other sort of arms that you can use... to achieve something.<sup>62</sup>

In the complex political and economic context of the Bananas dispute, the same WTO official further elucidated, the DSS 'enhanced cooperation between the Membership... [I]t engaged the Members and... gave a certain dynamic to the exchanges between Members. Whether the dynamic was always positive... is, of course, another question. But it... got people around the table and it got people talking'.<sup>63</sup>

Hence, rather than serving as a means to elicit strict legal compliance with WTO rules and to deliver justice by maintaining the original distribution of commitments articulated in the WTO agreements, the DSS, as the assorted testimonies of practitioners involved in EC-Bananas suggest, formed the place where noncompliance with the said commitments could have been gradually translated into a discursive process of renegotiation and transformation, and eventually into a settlement that relocates the rights and obligations of international trade cooperation and accommodates the conflicting interests of the numerous parties involved, including those of third-states with interests at stake (i.e. the ACPs).

Evidence from the Jurisprudence

The enhanced role played by the DSS along EC-Bananas as an orderly mechanism for fostering renegotiation, reallocation, and settlement, is apparent not only from the evidence generated through interviews with WTO professionals; it is also echoed in the choices made and the considerations taken into account by WTO adjudicators themselves along the dispute.

A good illustration in this respect may be traced in the active and discrete attempts on the part of the adjudicators in EC-Bananas to encourage a mutually-agreed settlement between the parties,<sup>64</sup> and more so in the distinctive willingness of WTO panellists to structure concrete focal points and provide the parties with specific suggestions on how to move forward in the negotiations toward the resolution of the dispute.<sup>65</sup> Thus, for example, after declaring the revised EU banana regime introduced in 1999 to be still WTO-inconsistent, the first compliance panel in EC-Bananas found it appropriate on this unique occasion to make specific suggestions to the EU “with a view toward promptly bringing the dispute to an end.”<sup>66</sup> Consequently, at the end of its report the compliance panel outlined three possible ways to be taken by the EU with respect to its banana regime. Among these ways, the move of the EU to a tariff-only regime for the importation of bananas, accompanied by a tariff/tariff-quota preference for the ACPs that is to be covered by a suitable WTO waiver or an FTA consistent with GATT Article XXIV.<sup>67</sup>

---

<sup>62</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (10 July 2012) (alternation added).

<sup>63</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (10 July 2012).

Beyond the notable departure of the compliance panel from the usual practice of WTO adjudicators of avoiding making any such suggestions, for the purposes of the present contribution no less important are the particular nature and content of the abovementioned policy recommendations put forward by the panellists. First, the panel suggestions to the EU were effectively of the kind that required all the parties involved in EC-Bananas to cooperate and engage in further negotiations in order to settle the dispute. Thus, the move to a tariff-only regime as suggested by the panel essentially required all the relevant parties to renegotiate the EU’s tariff rate for the importation of bananas under GATT Article XXVIII; likewise, a suitable waiver that may have allowed the EU to

---

<sup>64</sup> See Decision by the Arbitrators, European Communities–Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, Recourse to Arbitration by the European Communities under Article 22.6 of the DSU, para 2.13, WT/DS27/ARB (9 April 1999). On that occasion, the arbitrators in the EU-US Article 22.6 proceeding chose to open their award by encouraging ‘the parties to continue in their efforts to reach a mutually acceptable solution to this matter promptly’, while noting that ‘the suspension of concessions is not in the economic interest of either of them’. The significance of this statement becomes all the more clear once one takes into account the rarity of such pronouncements in WTO judicial practice. Thus, Porges notes, although ‘[i]n theory, WTO panels may actively encourage settlement... in practice none do’. A Porges, ‘Settling WTO Disputes: What Do Litigation Models Tell Us?’ (2004) 19 Ohio State Journal on Dispute Resolution 141, 167.

<sup>65</sup> Note that although WTO adjudicators are authorized under DSU Article 19.1 to suggest ways in which WTO Members could implement their rulings and resolve the dispute, they have rarely used this power. J Pelzman and A Shoham, ‘WTO DSU-Enforcement Issues’ in H Beladi and KE Choi (eds), Trade Disputes and the Dispute Settlement Understanding of the WTO: An Interdisciplinary Assessment (Emerald Group Publishing, Bingley, 2009) 369, 376–7.

<sup>66</sup> Panel Report, European Communities–Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, Recourse to Article 21.5 of the DSU by Ecuador, para 6.154, WT/DS27/RW/ECU (12 April 1999).

<sup>67</sup> Ibid., paras 6.154–6.158.

maintain its WTO-inconsistent trade preferences for the ACPs could have only be granted in the WTO system through a particular politico-diplomatic process under the WTO Agreement; finally, the conclusion of FTAs that will exempt the preferential treatment accorded by the EU to the ACPs similarly required these two group of states to enter into negotiation with each other.

Second, and more importantly, the panel's suggestions manifested some meaningful sensitivity to the complex circumstances of the case at hand, as well as an attempt to factor into the suggestions 'other-regarding' considerations related to the potential effects of the panel's decision and any future EU banana regime on affected third-states—the ACPs. Thus, the panel's suggestions did not simply call for the elimination of the discriminatory trade effects of the EU banana regime in the name of trade liberalization; instead, the panel's suggestions pointed to several ways under which the EU's trade preferences for the ACPs could be maintained, but in a manner that may alleviate some of the WTO-inconsistencies pertaining to the EU banana policy, and that may improve somewhat the standing of the Latin American countries vis-à-vis the EU market.

In the spirit of this sensitivity, and after having made the aforementioned suggestions, the WTO panel ultimately found it appropriate to close its ruling on this occasion with the following 'concluding remark':

We recall that the fundamental principles of the WTO and WTO rules are designed to foster development, not impede it. As illustrated by our suggestions on implementation above, the WTO system is flexible enough to allow... appropriate policy responses in a wide variety of circumstances across countries, including countries that are heavily dependent on the production and commercialization of bananas.<sup>68</sup>

Arguably, had the panel perceived its function in EC-Bananas merely as enforcing WTO law and securing compliance with the original WTO trade commitments, it would have probably avoided making such pronouncements and policy suggestions. By making, instead, these particular judicial choices and by taking such a reflective stance, the panel essentially revealed the plurality of considerations and broader horizons of justice—beyond compliance and the rule of law—that come into play in WTO adjudication, and manifested the enhanced role played by the DSS in this dispute in stimulating renegotiation, reallocation and settlement between the parties, while providing them with relevant policy suggestions for this purpose. These suggestions, as later days showed, substantively informed the negotiations held between the parties to EC-Bananas,<sup>69</sup> and formed a constitutive element of both the 2001 Understanding on Bananas reached between the EU, the US, and Ecuador, and the final Geneva Agreement concluded between the numerous parties to the dispute and which came into force in late 2012.

---

<sup>68</sup> Ibid, para 6.164.

Under the analysis of WTO judicial practice conducted herein, so it seems, emerges therefore an alternative version of the perennial Bananas dispute, of the institutional roles played by the DSS along it, and of the social outcomes to which this adjudicative system gave rise—a version somewhat different and more complex than the one conveyed so far through the narrow rule-enforcement perspective of the WTO DSS. As a WTO legal officer nicely put it:

The Banana case... is a perfect example that can be used to show either that the [WTO dispute settlement] system is very good, or the system is very bad, depending on which view you take about it... [Y]ou hear a lot of observers, they tell you, "Oh, it is used to show that the system is a disaster".... It took so long and the EU was not complying, etc.... [I]t clearly took a long time, but that's only because the case was a very complex case, and... when you have a case of that dimension... you need to go gradually about it. You cannot just... destroy this policy that the EU had in place to benefit these ACP countries and to order its own market... you need to have gradual changes, which the successive dispute allowed to. And if you see it from... [the point of view of] the complainant[s].... Every successive case that they brought... improved their conditions to access the EC market.... So even before the last case, they were already increasing their participation... [in the EC] bananas market.... And, at the same time, the ACP countries, which find it very hard to compete, because they have structural problems, have been able to get some development assistance, which hopefully will help them address the kind of structural problems that they need [to tackle].<sup>70</sup>

---

<sup>69</sup> T Josling, 'Bananas and the WTO: Testing the New Dispute Settlement Process' in Banana Wars (n 36) 169, 190.

<sup>70</sup> Interview with WTO legal officer (16 March 2012) (alternations added).

The WTO DSS, as this excerpt and the more complex alternative version of EC-Bananas unfolded along this section suggest, is thus not merely an enforcement mechanism, designed to elicit states' compliance with WTO rules and strictly preserve a formerly agreed-upon allocation of rights, obligations, and trade concessions. It is a forum of litigation, struggle, renegotiation, redistribution, and settlement, where many conflicts are fought not only about adherence to formerly agreed rules—though this is certainly an important function of the system—but over broader political, economic, moral, and social interests and values.

In certain realities, however, as the case in point further makes clear, these multiple and competing functions of the DSS do not coincide with one another, imposing, in turn, inevitable trade-offs between the outcomes generated by the system. Thus, in the convoluted Bananas case, as the above discussion implies, the DSS's role in facilitating renegotiation and settlement, ultimately resulting in an 'agreement at intermediate points' beneficial to the disputing parties, came into collision with the oft-cited enforcement role of the system, which denotes 'a principled-driven adherence' to WTO rules, beneficial to the broader 'security and predictability of the multilateral trading system'.<sup>71</sup>

In terms of outcomes, then, in EC-Bananas, a negotiated settlement—which reallocates Members' rights and duties, grants remunerative market access rights to the complainants, maintains the ACPs trade preferences, and thereby promotes long-term cooperative relations—outweighed compliance with the legal prescriptions originally agreed-upon in the WTO agreements. In terms of 'justice', in turn, one may then ultimately suggest, in EC-Bananas, 'distributive', 'corrective', or perhaps 'transformative' justice, came at the expense of justice in its formal legal sense.

Against this backdrop, and as the following section now moves to more closely show, a broader understanding of the multiple roles played by the WTO DSS and a wider view of the diverse social outcomes it brings about, may lead to the conclusion that, at least in some occasions, the renegotiating, reallocating, and dispute settling functions of the DSS, while they may not necessarily lead to full legal compliance, may promote certain dimensions of justice nonetheless.

---

<sup>71</sup> On this tension between the DSS's functions see Pelzman and Shoham (n 65) 377; C Carmody, 'Remedies and Conformity under the WTO Agreement' (2002) 5 Journal of International Economic Law 307, 322.

IV. Widening the Lens: Towards a Broader ‘Grammar of Justice’ in Discussions of WTO Adjudication

To be clear at this point, by carrying out the above analytical and empirical endeavor this contribution has not aimed at portraying EC-Bananas as an impeccable deed of the WTO DSS. From a rule of law perspective, the noncompliant outcome ultimately produced in this perennial dispute is clearly problematic. Not only such an outcome hinders the promotion of a legally predictable multilateral trade system—an explicit goal entrusted with the DSS;<sup>72</sup> it is also rather patent that the ability of many WTO Members to similarly ‘buy-out’ their way of compliance—as essentially did the EU in this case—is limited if at all existent, and may therefore result in power-imbalance and inequality between WTO Members.<sup>73</sup>

Without underrating such important consequences and the injustices associated therewith, by putting forward the alternative account of EC-Bananas in the previous section, this contribution has sought to disclose the still incomplete picture of the WTO DSS’s functions and outcomes unfolded through the lens of the prevailing enforcement-oriented perspective of the system. Particularly, the article has strived to illuminate the cardinal roles actually served by the DSS along this dispute as a forum of renegotiation, settlement, and reallocation of concessions, as well as to expose the conflicting outcomes consequently engendered by the system. Among them, a mutually-agreed settlement, that alongside its noncompliant features appears to bear also some substantial cooperative, rectificatory, and redistributive social effects (i.e. effects that go beyond the mere preservation of the original distribution of expectations articulated in the WTO treaty).

By overshadowing such institutional roles and social effects, this final section now turns to argue, the prevalent enforcement-centered perspective of the WTO DSS and its conceptualization of justice mainly through procedural and legalistic terms (e.g. lawabidingness, compliance, and access to justice), has essentially worked further to eclipse other cardinal dimensions of justice—such as global distributive, corrective, or transformative justice—to which the operation of the legalized DSS could perhaps contribute, and on which it seems to be de facto influencing.<sup>74</sup>

---

<sup>72</sup> See DSU art 3.2.

<sup>73</sup> On the injustices associated with such a ‘buy-out’ possibility in the WTO DSS context see JH Jackson, ‘International Law Status of WTO Dispute Settlement Reports: Obligation to Comply or Option to “Buy Out”?’ (2004) 98 American Journal of International Law 109, 117–8, 120–1.

On Distributive, Corrective and Transformative Justice in EC-Bananas

A first notable illustration of the assertion just made in the context of EC-Bananas may be found in the manner in which the emphasis placed by commentators along this dispute on legal justice and the enduring EU noncompliant behavior essentially resulted in the neglect of intricate questions of distributive justice that were lurking behind this perennial dispute and that should have arguably affected its outcomes.<sup>75</sup> Among these questions, which were often marginalized in the vehement compliance-oriented debates of EC-Bananas, is the question of the possible effects of strict enforcement of the original distribution of WTO obligations in this case, given the economic dependence developed by affected third-states—the ACPs—on exports to the EU market; the intricate question concerning the similarity or rather the disparity of the socio-economic conditions prevailing in the two rival groups of developing countries with interest in access to the major market of Europe; and, consequently, the weight, if any, that should have been given to such factors in the resolution of the dispute and the redistribution of trade concessions among the parties involved through the devise of an amended EU banana regime.

---

<sup>74</sup> In a somewhat similar spirit, Petersmann has noted: ‘In terms of Aristotelian distinction between ‘general principles of justice’ (like liberty, equality, fair procedures, promotion of general consumer welfare) and particular principles of justice requiring adjustments depending on particular circumstances, WTO rule-making and WTO dispute settlement procedures can also contribute to ‘corrective justice’ and ‘reciprocal justice’, just as the special, differential and non-reciprocal treatment of less-developed WTO Members in numerous WTO provisions may contribute to ‘distributive justice’’. E-U Petersmann, ‘Multilevel Juridical Governance of International Trade Requires a Common Conception of Rule of Law and Justice’ (2007) 10 Journal of International Economic Law 529, 534.

<sup>75</sup> Distributive justice is concerned with the ways in which benefits and burdens are shared among members of a society/community. Chris Armstrong, Global Distributive Justice: An Introduction (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 2012) 15–16. Note that while questions of distributive justice in the particular context of the WTO DSS have not been the subject of much academic inquiry, the more general issue of the relation between international trade and global distributive justice has recently attracted a growing research attention. See e.g., ibid. 162–187; FJ Garcia, Global Justice and International Economic Law (2013); M Risse, On Global justice (2012) 346–360.

While such questions escaped a thorough and critical academic debate in writing on EC-Bananas and the operation of the DSS along it, this sort of considerations, as seen in Section III, seem to have not gone unnoticed by WTO adjudicators. Thus, for example, in its recommendations on possible modifications to the EU banana regime, the first compliance panel in EC-Bananas, as indicated in the previous section, went a long way in order to lay down the contours of possible legal options that may improve the position of the Latin American complainants vis-à-vis the EU market, while at the same time maintain the EU's trade preferences for the ACPs within the legal flexibilities of the WTO rules-based system. As further noted above, the options outlined by the panel later on proved to have a significant impact on subsequent negotiations that were held between the parties towards the resolution of the Bananas conflict, and became a constitutive element of the final Geneva Agreement settling the case.

Through their ruling and uncommon suggestions, therefore, the WTO panellists seem to have implicitly introduced elements of distributive justice into the negotiations between the parties—laying the ground for an outcome that accounts for the interests of the Latin American complainants as well as affected third-states with interest at stake,<sup>76</sup> while tempering possible unfairness that may result from the strict application of the law and the original distribution of entitlements embedded therein.<sup>77</sup>

EC-Bananas, the prominent renegotiation and settlement roles served by the DSS along the dispute, and the negotiated outcome ultimately reached in the shadow of WTO adjudication—securing the complainants better access to the EU market through a revised, less WTO-inconsistent, 'tariff-only' regime, while effectively leaving in place the ACP's tariff preferences—also encapsulate various important facets of corrective justice.

First, in the bilateral contractual relationship between the complainants and the respondent, the improved EU tariffs for banana imports agreed upon in the Geneva Agreement may be taken to play an important compensatory role for the impairment <sup>76</sup> Note that the new EU tariff rates for banana imports negotiated between the EU and the Latin American countries under the Geneva Agreement were incorporated into the EU's WTO tariff schedules. Consequently, the new EU tariffs apply on an MFN basis, so that the redistributive outcome produced in EC-Bananas essentially extends to the entire WTO Membership.

---

<sup>77</sup> A somewhat similar discussion may be found in Franck's discussion of the ICJ 1969 North Sea Continental Shelf cases. See TM Franck, Fairness in International Law and Institutions (Oxford University Press, New York, 1998) 61–63.

caused by the EU's WTO-inconsistent and discriminatory behavior.<sup>78</sup> Yet, as the EU was bound by the lower tariffs only from the day of concluding the Geneva Agreement (December 15, 2009), past injury suffered by the Latin American banana suppliers throughout the perennial Bananas conflict was accorded no redress. Circumstances of this sort, it may be noted, have led some commentators to call for the introduction of remedial mechanisms such as retroactive financial compensation and reparation for past damage to the WTO DSS<sup>79</sup>—that is, for the introduction of more corrective justice elements into the WTO judicial system.<sup>80</sup>

The contractual relations between the complainants and the EU represent, however, only one instance for reflecting on issues of corrective justice in the context of the protracted Bananas dispute. Another such salient instance is the one related to the close relationship between the EU and the ACPs, and the historical commitment of the first to the latter—a commitment that largely triggered the enduring EU noncompliance in EC-Bananas. Herewith several intricate questions arise: what were the exact duties of justice owed by the EU to the ACPs and which nourished the prolonged EU noncompliance with WTO law and rulings? Were these duties of justice applicable to the EU as a whole, or only to the particular EU Members with post-colonial ties? If, indeed, such ex-colonizer duties applied to the EU in its entirety, what, if any, could have justified the disparate application of such duties in the EU's relations vis-à-vis two similar groups of developing countries in EC-Bananas—the ACPs and the Latin American complainants—both ex-European colonies and both heavily dependent on banana production for their economic well-being? Also, and more generally, may the will to remedy one group of countries for past (colonial) wrongs justify, in any way, the imposition of harm on others? And lastly, what room, if at all, should post-colonial duties to make reparation for historical injustices have in the present multilateral trade setting of the WTO and in disputes coming before it?

In the extensive debates of the perennial Bananas dispute conducted largely through the enforcement-centered view of the DSS and the 'rule of law' conception of justice

---

<sup>78</sup> On corrective justice as applicable to private interests in bilateral contractual relationships and the remedy of compensation accompanying this justice conception see C Carmody, 'WTO Obligations as Collective' (2006) 17 European Journal of International Law 419, 423; Winthrop (n 10) 1024.

<sup>79</sup> See e.g., Bronckers and van den Broek (n 47); J Pauwelyn, 'Enforcement and Countermeasures in the WTO: Rules are Rules—Toward a More Collective Approach' (2000) 94 American Journal of International Law 335, 346.

<sup>80</sup> Carmody (n 78) at 432. See also in this regard Carmody (n 43) 535.

accompanying it, the long line of corrective justice questions just flagged above, however, received little to no academic attention.

Finally, the perennial Bananas conflict, the roles played by the DSS along it, and the negotiated outcome ultimately reached between the numerous parties involved, may also be interestingly explored through the lens of the rather more modern notion of transformative justice; a notion of justice that does not seek to distribute rights and obligations or to correct harm exclusively, 'but rather to resolve conflicts between national interests in a manner that develops and strengthens relationships among those involved'.<sup>81</sup>

Transformative justice, as noted by Carmody, aims to fashion accommodative relationships between groups with competing interests.<sup>82</sup> Accordingly, as elaborated on this concept in another study:

Transformative justice must be driven by the needs of participants. Decisions on how to resolve the conflict ought to be based on a consensus.... The goal will be to find common ground on which a mutually acceptable resolution can be established. This is the power of transformative justice: the possibility of using the substance of a conflict as a means of exploring options and establishing responses that are not only acceptable to all parties but develop and strengthen relationships among those involved.<sup>83</sup>

Within this transformative justice framework, in turn, the adjudicative process—rather than being a means for the mere application of the law, the advancement of legal predictability, and the vindication of rights in a victory versus defeat pattern—serves as a mechanism to facilitate the active participation of the relevant parties in finding a mutually agreed solution to the dispute.<sup>84</sup> In other words, unlike the traditional perception of the judicial process as a two-sided adversarial process that works to produce

---

<sup>81</sup> Carmody (n 43) at 532.

<sup>82</sup> Carmody (n 78) at 433.

<sup>83</sup> Law Commission of Canada, 'From Restorative Justice to Transformative Justice: Discussion Paper' (1999) 42, available at <http://dalspace.library.dal.ca/bitstream/handle/10222/10289/Participatory%20Justice%20Discussion%20Paper%20EN.pdf?sequence=1>, accessed 24 June 2015. The Discussion Paper begins with the notion of 'restorative justice' as it has been developed in the criminal justice system, and seeks to extend it, through the notion of 'transformative justice', to other fields of law.

<sup>84</sup> Cf ibid, 27–28.

winners and losers, under a transformative justice approach ‘the aim of dispute settlement is to achieve solutions that are acceptable to all of the parties, and that promote interdependence’. Under this latter approach, there is ‘[n]o absolute requirement to restore the relationship by repairing the harm done. Relief is instead fashioned along flexible and broadly remedial lines’.<sup>85</sup>

While the WTO Agreement contains fundamental aspects of distributive and corrective justice, Carmody has observed, when ‘[t]hought about carefully, transformative justice seems to best describe the overall operation of the WTO agreement’. It explains ‘the insistence on consensus’ in the WTO framework. It explains ‘the shape of dispute settlement’ and the explicit preference made in DSU Article 3.7 for ‘a solution that is mutually acceptable to the parties’. Finally, transformative justice also ‘explains the reflexive relationship between dispute settlement and negotiation’ in the WTO system.<sup>86</sup>

EC-Bananas, as the empirical account of this charged and complex conflict provided in Section III has shown, illustrates probably more than any other WTO dispute this reflexive relationship. This dispute illuminates how the legalized, multi-stages WTO dispute settlement procedures serve not necessarily as a backward looking two-sided process, but rather as a mechanism for bringing together all the parties with interests at stake, facilitating renegotiation between them, and allowing them to arrive at a balanced accommodation of the competing interests that is acceptable to them all and conducive to their long-term cooperative relations. Put differently, EC-Bananas, the intertwining between third-party adjudication and negotiation along the dispute, and the mutually-agreed settlement ultimately achieved in this case exemplify how the conflict situation between the manifold parties with interest at stake was transformed, through the adjudicative process, from one in which groups were in competition with one another to one in which groups came to recognize their mutual interests and were better able to arrive at a workable solution.

---

<sup>85</sup> Carmody (n 43) at 535.

<sup>86</sup> Carmody (n 78) at 434.

On the Complementing and Conflicting Nature of the Various Conceptions of Justice

As one may infer at this point, the latter notion of transformative justice, like the concepts of distributive and corrective justice, or the legal justice concept prevalent in existing discussions of EC-Bananas and the WTO DSS more generally, each resonates with different moral concerns and social interests that manifest themselves in the real life of WTO adjudication. Each provides a unique perspective on how to assess the diverse functions played and the social outcomes generated by the WTO DSS. Each perspective is thus inevitably partial. Finally, at times, tensions may also arise between the different perspectives.

One such notable tension is the one flagged by Franck in his treatise Fairness in International Law and Institutions, between, on the one hand, the more substantive, distributive aspect of justice, and, on the other hand, its rather legal and procedural dimension.<sup>87</sup> Whereas the former favors change, Franck has noted, the latter dimension of justice expresses the preference for order and provides the kind of stability that the rule of law generally supports.<sup>88</sup> '[I]t accommodates a deeply felt popular belief that for a system of rules to be fair, it must be firmly rooted in a framework of formal requirements about how rules are made, interpreted, and applied', and it must equally enforce the rules against everyone.<sup>89</sup> In some cases, therefore, Franck has concluded, these two dimensions of justice may come into collision,<sup>90</sup> since 'the rule of law', in its preference for order and stability, may be uncondusive to change and 'may impede the advancement of justice, understood as a matter of moral distributive allotments or as rectification for wrongs of the past'.<sup>91</sup>

A tension of this sort, so it seems, indeed manifested itself in the Bananas dispute discussed herein. Whereas the pursuit of justice in its international rule of law dimension pulled in the direction of strict enforcement of WTO law on the EU, rectification for past colonial wrongs and the advancement of a new distributive allotment between the disputing parties and affected third-states pulled in another, less WTO-compliant direction.

---

<sup>87</sup> Franck (n 77) 7–9.

<sup>88</sup> Ibid; L May, Global Justice and Due Process (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 2010) 58–59.

<sup>89</sup> Franck (n 77) 7–8.

<sup>90</sup> Franck (n 77) 7.

<sup>91</sup> May (n 88) 59.

In the contestation between these various dimensions of justice, as insinuated earlier, the latter dimensions seem to have prevailed.

That said, in the extensive discussions of the convoluted Bananas dispute along the years, often conducted through the enforcement-oriented lens of the WTO DSS, this tension between the various dimensions of justice underlying the conflict and the operation of the DSS has been hardly addressed. So has been the case with respect to the various questions of distributive, corrective and transformative justice briefly delineated throughout this section, as well as with respect to the more general, but fundamental question, of whether the WTO DSS is at all a suitable forum where such dilemmas of justice should be invoked; and if so, what principles and guarantees should be put in place in order to assure that they are adequately addressed.

EC-Bananas, therefore, as this article suggests, serves not only as an informative case for studying the manifold and competing roles—beyond enforcement—played by the WTO DSS in today global governance. It also serves as an instructive site for exposing some of the profound challenges of justice that pave their way to WTO adjudication; for highlighting the need to embrace a broader grammar of justice for evaluating the social outcomes the WTO DSS generates and the processes through which they are created; as well as for stressing the need to more generally rethink the delicate and complex relationship between noncompliance, justice, and the roles of international adjudicatory institutions such as the one operating within the WTO framework. Noncompliance, as the case in point has shown, need not be viewed solely through the enforcement role of the WTO DSS and its complementing rule of law conception of justice. It may also be construed through the settlement, renegotiation, and reallocation functions served by the DSS and the often-overlooked concepts of distributive, corrective, and transformative justice that such judicial functions bring to the fore.

V. Conclusion

The way we perceive the role/s of international courts like the WTO DSS defines the way we analyze their operation and capture their outcomes. It also brings certain issues of justice to the foreground and pushes other to the background. And so, as seen in this article, the prevalent enforcement-centered perspective of the WTO DSS—nourished by the legalization of the multilateral trade system and international law more generally—has resulted in the marginalization of other important functions, beyond enforcement, played by this international adjudicative system. Among them, the very traditional dispute settlement role of the DSS, as well as its cardinal functions as a forum of renegotiation and reallocation of rights and obligations between WTO Member states. In turn, the limited enforcement-centered perspective of the WTO DSS, due to its natural focus on such notions as the rule of law, compliance, and procedural justice, has further led to the neglect of other salient issues of justice that manifest themselves in WTO adjudication and on which the DSS seem to be effectively influencing. Against this backdrop, through a close empirical investigation of the perennial Bananas dispute and the intricate political, social, economic, and moral questions associated therewith, this contribution has sought to put forward a broader multifunctional account of the WTO DSS, and thereby to shed light on the consequent need to broaden the lens of justice—beyond the rule of law—in writing on the DSS, so as to more critically assess the actual functions served and social outcomes produced by this global judicial system.

Discussion Papers of the Center for Global Constitutionalism 2015

Ester Herlin-Karnell and Poul F. Kjaer Dimensions of Justice & Justification in EU and Transnational Contexts	SP IV 2015-801
Jan Pieter Beetz and Enzo Rossi EU Legitimacy in a Realist Key	SP IV 2015-802
Ben Crum From Public Reason to Multi-Layered Justice	SP IV 2015-803
Sionaidh Douglas-Scott Human Rights as a Basis for Justice in the European Union	SP IV 2015-804
Ester Herlin-Karnell Justice and Justification in Europe's "Area of Freedom, Security and Justice"	SP IV 2015-805
Lyn K.L. Tjon Soei-Len The Moral Limits of EU Internal Market Exchange Equal Respect and Capabilities	SP IV 2015-806
Sivan Shlomo-Agon Noncompliance, Renegotiation, and Justice in International Adjudication: A WTO-EU Perspective	SP IV 2015-807
Poul F. Kjaer The Function of Justification in Transnational Governance	SP IV 2015-808